

The Minstrel

REDEEMER COLLEGE LIBRARY

THE MINSTREL

PER/LH/3/.R4/M56

APR 24 1997

Redeemer College's Poetry and Fiction Magazine
volume 7, spring 1997

The Minstrel

Redeemer College's Poetry and Fiction Magazine

Volume 7, Spring 1997

"Ring out the want, the eare, the sin,
The faithless coldness of the times;
Ring out, ring out my mournful rhymes, But ring the fuller minstrel in."

Jennyson

Contents

Poems without titles are referred to by first line.

Marcia Elgersma		Wendy Hiemstra
The Morning	3	Of course then you never recognized	13
Jane Hogeterp		Corrina Maclean
The Sunday of Orthodoxy	3	Receiving Everything	13
Tracy Buys		Mike Kleinhuis
The peonies shake their pompons	4	I've Been Following My Cat Shadow	14
Kai Groen		Joni Westerink
to old friends and editors	5	Mind Games	14
Jeannette Sandink		Tim Lyon
Through My Eyes	6	Eh?	15
Andrea VanderKooij		Dan Koopman
The 7 o'clock	6	But Not...	16
Stephanie Cilia		Rachel VanArragon
Exp. Nov 01	7	Immunization	16
Caroline Kralt		Amanda Wilms
Room in the Attic	7	Emptiness	17
Tim Lyon		Marcia Elgersma
mem	8	The Gentleman of Venice	18
Julia Dam		Karen Brink
Aquarium	8	McGuire	19
Alan Groombridge		Julia Dam
University Poem	9	Leftovers	22
Sara Weber		Andrea Vanderkooij
2 am	10	Night Class	23
Caleb deBoer		Kai Groen
Irish Cream Coffee	10	Tired of	23
Kathleen Jarvis		Stephanie Cilia
Porcelain	11	Danse Macabre	24
Cheryl Hoftyzer		Kai Groen
Unshed Wisdom	12	Elegy	24
Andrea Vanderkooij		Jane Hogeterp
The Gift Shop	12	Two People in a Place	25

Kathleen Jarvis		Jeannette Sandink
Invisible	26	Sins of Omission	30
Neil Houtman		David Lehr
Salt Water Wells, Stale Loaves	26	Satellite on the Schoolyard	30
Karen Brink		Julia Dam
When I Was a Lamb	27	Song	32
Caleb deBoer		Caleb deBoer
Brotherly Love	28	Outsider	33
Jeannette Sandink		Stephanie Cilia
Lost in the Valley	29	Sour Grapes	33
Caroline Kralt
Buried Thoughts	29

Editor: David Lehr

Assistant Editor: Stephanie Cilia

Faculty Advisor: Prof. Hugh Cook

The Minstrel is published annually through funding by the Redeemer College Student Senate. It is written, edited and designed by students. Anyone who wishes to comment on The Minstrel, please speak to David Lehr or Stephanie Cilia. Anyone who is interested in the position of Assistant Editor for 1998, please speak to Stephanie Cilia.

Cover Art: I Wash My Hands Of It, by Brenda Dykstra

The Morning

There is a cathedral sacredness in dawn's sacrament, an orchestration in the open stillness, yet a symphony of silence.
In the vibrant murkiness the shadowy willows, arrayed in silken livery,
attend night's benedict.
While scattering their blushing leaf, the garlands usher in the white bride ghost of morning who, with veil of milky teardrop, haunts the earthen aisle.
from airy rostrum, the pulsating orb of cardinal fire proclaims the benediction.
The dusken embrace of dawn lifts the veil of mist to celebrate the ceremonious marriage of the morning.

Marcia Elgersma

The Sunday of Orthodoxy

Old black coat Woolen and worn with a stench
Of garlic over garlic.
The wooden pew recognises Every crevice of your shape
As it knows its own Cracked and coated veneer.
You have been here
In the light and darkness.

Old black hat
Rises out of dense clouds
Of sweet incense
And smoking candle.
The lights of those before you Cast shadows of colour
And shine
With modest brilliance
Upon your simple head.

Old dark face Lifted humble high Into the heavy air,
Your eyes wet with baptism
That pour from the icons
Who tell the story;
This steadfast story
That has kept you here
A disciple, a follower, Brother, father,
Lover
Has led me here,
A stranger
Who has known you forever.

—Jane Hogeterp

Untitled

The peonies shake their pompons thanking the wind for the chance to dance. While I lounge in the hammock, I admire those brave and cheerful peonies, their scarlet vivacity, their crimson glory, how they nod and laugh in the breeze.
There they grow in the middle of the emerald lawn, so brave and bold and brazen.

Somewhere above me Sammy Bluejay squawks unpleasantly and I peer up among the pine needles of the two trees which carry my hammock like the two unlucky girls at recess assigned to the skipping rope ends.
Yes, there's old Sammy, blue and loud as ever.

The association between summer and childhood is strong; hair flying in the wind, exploring corners in the yard, searching for treasures along the fence lines, the smell of clover and trefoil blown across the fields, hide and seek among the hay stooks, the red painted swing set, the swimming pool, my brother and I being Superman-- holding our towels high and running around the house, racing our bikes around the manure pile at milking time-- him as Rosco and me as Bo or Luke Duke, our rock collections are the end of the lane, dragging our heavy and stiff cat off the road, desperately trying to understand, and not to cry.

Among the sounds of crickets, the drone of a bee and a distant haybine, the song of a single robin is somewhere close by; it starts and stops and starts again. I feel no need to open my eyes or find it; it sounds like the echo of the child's voice, a sure thing, a lasting thing.

—Tracey Buys

to old friends and editors disillusioned me

 I wander wonder in a hopeless wood you watch above the blackened trees in a purple sky from a mighty zeppelin

a damned doctor killed my child with the knife of circumcision

disillusioned me
the wind is fire burns my face away
I'm finally naked
 and I see you look at me through icy pools a million miles away

—Kai Groen

Through my Eyes

We lie here making snow angels in the dark night;
above, we see stars faintly, behind the clouds.

Some would find meaning in simple observation, but I am less a poet than a dreamer with a pen.

—Jeannette Sandink

untitled

The seven o'clock light slants like Emily Dickinson's truth between the houserows making everything oddly beautiful.

It's strange, light at eye-level as though all is darkness above my head.
Even the bugs cast shadows.

And the grass on the side of the highway filters the light like beer through charcoal

leaving the ditch golden full of whiskey.

—Andrea VanderKooij

Exp./ 96 NOV 01

The day he said he loved me I cried; bud passion bloomed softly, scarlet like the peonies I grew under the kitchen window, and though I never knew when the flowers died, I watched his love for me turn rancid--a stench like forgotten butter in a fridge of chilled memories, where he must have kept what poisoned me. When I expired he cleaned it out--replaced the old with new stock--fresh products give him pleasure; I watch him savour them like a wine-taster who swirls the liquid in his mouth then spits, already grasping a new glass.
If he could feel me now, it would be my icy fingers wrapped around his kissed neck, and after I revelled in his humiliating, undignified demise, I would unplug his fridge and put him in it to rot, marked forever on his sallow forehead with an expiry date from months before.

—Stephanie Cilia

Room in the Attic

Shafts of sunlight filter through faded folds of lace.
Reflected particles of dust swirl through the air.
Dust lies thick on the wooden window frame;
It blankets the floor, revealing the footsteps of all who have Entered.

—Caroline Kralt

mem

I caught you floating away with my memory flitting around on some hill I gave you a piece to chew on you bit off more said you could handle it but it was my memory and it exploded in your mind soon you realised that you could not really be a part of every little bit
I sort of bit my lip and made a mental note not to let you sample as much the next time

—Tim Lyon

Aquarium

You swim inside your glass bubble;
I look at you with a magnified eye and study your skin that looks like a slippery golden slide, like the one I used to play on in my youth.
I remember the day I found you;
you had stolen away from your school to explore your large green world with those innocent eyes.
But I, scooping you into my mesh ladle, out of your swampy-souped dwelling, gave you a new place-- a windowed palace carpeted in crystal, ornamented with sparkling gems-- a ballroom to dart and dance among exotic plants, to parade your coat of gold, swishing your royal fans.

You press your nose against the pane, staring at me blankly, sadly through pupils now dried up like mud splotted on misty glass, methodically mouthing the word you have been for years:
Home...Home...Home....

—Julia Dam

University Poem

Yet such is the bitter specimen of the fruit of that ambitious system which has of late years been making way among us; for its result on ordinary minds, and on the common rule of students, is less satisfactory still; they leave their place of education simply dissipated and relaxed by the multiplicity of subjects, which they have never really mastered, and so shallow as not even to know their shallowness.

-John Henry Newman, The Idea of a University, 1852.

so now that you know everything that there is to know where are you going
to go
?
and what are you going
to do
?
with it
?

—Alan Groombridge

2 am.

Icy raindrops continue falling rhythmically, Dark clouds engulf the sky,
Layers of snow melt slowly Strong winds blow by, whistling with ease.

My body shivers as the frigid air fills my lungs,
The smell of melting snow tells me of spring's soon arrival, Lights in windows come on all around,
A flowing stream of water fills the cracks of The sidewalk and races to the ditch.

Despite the cold, I begin to grow tired,
It's time to leave this closing winter carnival,
I crawl back in bed with a sense of relief,
And fall asleep to the lullaby of rain.

—Sara Weber

Irish Cream Coffee

There it is The YMCA
I've been here just a little while cased it twice so far

The blue posters on white walls laugh and jeer Once I step in I become a statistic a bum

I am pushed in by those in my life but repulsed by my mind Only the destitute go there

I take another sip of Irish cream coffee
Look around and listen to the bustle of the Food Court

I must go in, to face the truth
I have been judged Unemployed
the people lock me up into mental isolation

Before I go Another cup of Irish cream coffee

—Caleb deBoer

Porcelain

A tiny hand, curled in sleep,
such a grip on my heart.
Every twitch of the porcelain mouth tugs at my heart.
He speaks not a word but his eyes tell tales beyond his years.
Wisdom in those eyes, eyes that can see deep into the depths of my soul.
For this tiny one,
I would give my very life.
Through so much,
his brief life only beginning.
This innocence,
simple love,
controls me in a way,
a way no other can.
For him, anything-- all for him.
I'll do what he asks.
Manipulation
in a porcelain smile.

—Kathleen Jarvis

Unshed Wisdom

Picnic table,
smooth and comfortable resting under the great oak Oh tree of wisdom, of deliverance
Why do you not speak?

Laughing voices ascend to the silver stars they speak, they remember the drudging daily routine of life, as a singed log to a raging fire.

Picnic table,
harsh and scuffed
ignores the whispered song of the towering tree, Oh mind of ignorance, of harm
Why do you not learn?

Hushed nerves thrive on the melted wood, yearning to forget the reason of such stillness, of thirsty forgetfulness.

Picnic table,
harsh and scuffed,
With the shell of unshed blood.

—Cheryl Hoftyzer

The Gift Shop

is usually my favourite part of the Art Museum

(I feel kind of bad about that sometimes)

—Andrea VanderKooij

Untitled

Of course then you never recognised the details for what they were. Like the time Mom and Dad bought Betsy, the jersey cow, from the Jobseys. Jim and Henny Jobsey had left Betsy with her calf until both bovines were practically the same size. So when Betsy came to live on the farm, she spent the first two weeks bawling. What did you know about the dark rivers of hair beneath the eyes?

You were puzzled by your cousin's crying in the graveyard. From the back of the car you asked why the monthly visits to Beppe had ended.

I must admit, when the pain and terror were yours, you never had any trouble expressing sorrow. Somewhere hidden in the depths of your heart was a great tap that was far too easy to turn on. And with all the tears came a terrible wailing for which you were christened "the fire engine" by the extended family.

Of course now the wailing has ended.

Eventually you notice a lack of emotion. No, not a lack of emotion but an awkwardness. Like the time you told Mom over the phone you loved her and her response was: "Pardon?"

In a dream you were cut by the kaas schaaf, a big, ugly, red gouge across the cheek. Mom didn't even care. In a preoccupied oblivion she ignored your pain.

You suspected it was the adolescent thing. "It's natural for teens to confide in their friends."

You suspected it was the Dutch immigrant background pushing aside emotions and persevering. "If you can't ate it you von't need it."

But now Oma had died and you have new suspicions. Mom had been acting more and more like Opa. Dad says things will be different for Mom when Opa eventually dies. And while you listen to the details, the stories, the stories you have heard before, you wonder if Mom ever cries like Betsy.

—Gwenda Hiemstra

Receiving Everything

Conflict,
Tossing To and Fro, Stability,
Fleeting Like a Shadow.

Confusion,
Thundering Inside.
Fear, Coiling Tight.

Hunting
For A Steadfast
Place
Receiving Everything in His Amazing Grace.

—corina i. maclean

the minstrel

I've Been Following My Cat Shadow*

Perched in the rafters
Of hand-hewn logs Shaped with iron claws, Shadow sits regally Watching all below.

She glides down to The couch then onto the Floor only pausing to Look at me acknowledging The game is on.

I scamper after her As she hobbles over The cold granite floor,
Her crippled leg striving To keep the pace.

Up the steep stairs
She flies as I Trail behind on All fours hoping To catch her before

She goes under the Bed making my arm
A log she can shape
With her claws as I reach to tag her.

*title inspired by Cat Stevens

—Mike Kleinhuis

Mind Games

Drink it in, then quickly turn away every time, never give mustn't shatter the illusion Push and Pull.
I want you--go away
I need you--who me?
As if.
I need someone--single life's the best Let's talk--never be honest though

More games, then one falters, quickly recover, in time for the other to break down the guard.
The rules are bent, broken for a few months then reinstated
Now it's not a game
I think it's real--at least for you.
It's becoming real for me.
I just haven't figured out who made that change you, me, or him?

—Joni Westerink

Eh?

And why do you call me
At this strange hour Anyway
As if you have Anything left to say Already you have said too much And jumped the gun Anticipating my stop “Alright this is where I get off,” I yell

After several more calls
Any sensible person would have done the same Altering my hairdo was too far Anything to avoid you I vowed Advancing from the other direction Adroitly approaching you head bowed Assuming an attitude of apprehension Aggressively I fail to mention Army boots are not my favourite style
And perhaps it is better if I don't see you At least for a while

Aaaaauugh come hither my love one last smile Anger is not becoming my precious child Escape escape for a while And come back when the weather is mild

—Tim Lyon

...But Not

It begins
Innocent and naive;
Solitude, but not Isolated, however, free.
Thoughts remembered, figures stored Images interact and you listen; Mimicking is no longer
You are your own, but not

Instinct
Impulse
Repeat
Discover Interact Conscious

Short lived freedom, long remembered.
Life with others;
Others are life, but not Given life
Discover life Experience life
Love life
It leaves
Suddenly, it all ends

But not Isolated, solitude
But not Alone
It ends, it is finished,
But not

—Dan Koopman

Immunization

sometimes we're so pedantic and so stiff and afraid

maybe it's just me but please don't be immune to me have I changed or do I just act different have you changed or was it just a passing phase

I don't know why i feel this way, then that but I fear myself and where my mind takes me my eyes hurt from looking at you, and I ache

my internal being hurts from you looking at me and you're not asking the right questions and my feeling hurt from not seeing you

I want to create a gap because you seem so immune to me.

—Rachel VanArragon

Emptiness

Like my mailbox
The T.V when it's off
A violin without strings
A sock with no foot
A mug with no tea
The sky with no sun
The night with no moon
A rose with no petals
A clock with no hands
A classroom with no one to be taught A frame with no picture Eyes with no life
A mouth with no teeth
A calendar with no days
A sun-drenched strawberry with no taste.

—Amanda Wilms

The Gentleman of Venice

The sea spits brine to smoothe the corners of San Marco into arches, while beneath their bended yawn a man sits on the geometric square marbled by impressionist-schooled pigeons.
Their sketch chinks stone to stone beneath his restless feet.
A velvet Dali clock droops time upon his head, his shoulders roof to chimney'd brow, and sightless eyes lost in Mediterranean sight.
The winking sun glints humour off the waves;
its cosmic eye on twinkled azure blue. A sigh of laughing, boundless breath blows eye to tear
--the map of Venice in his face-- the spill picks path of age-worn duct.
His Shylock smile--of mooring poles, canal his tongue, a gondola
--laid claim his bond:
her pound of flesh, his squandered love.
He sits in sculpted pose, to wait with mirthless age for youth; or limping to the Bridge of Sighs in hope that Casanova will return.

—Marcia Elgersma

McGuire

I step backward so Crazy Man McGuire's words do not spit on my face.

"Are ye hearin' me boy! I'se just like you...young boy...ten years old. Just like you! So leave while ye can...get the hell out!"

McGuire's eyes are brazen blue. I look to see which one of them is the fake one. "Listen boy! I'se full of gumption...guts and marrow, and there I stood staring at them train tracks, ready to leave to Alberta, or Ontario. Them wheels was pumpin' and racin', the steam pipe was whistlin'...I was set to board the train out of this hell!"

The Cape station is empty except for Mrs. Maybird, a lady from our church, who looks up from her knitting and frowns.

Crazy Man isn't finished, "Here people don't get nowhere, you work and die, and marry and drink...I was leaving. I was ten...like you ...and leaving." McGuire's jaw comes loose and his tongue hangs out wolf-like. "You worried about missin' your momma? Missin' her tasty pies and warm bosom? I tell ya, there be lots of warm bosoms in Ontario!"

Momma. Momma gave me ten dollars when she kissed me goodbye at her apartment door. She pointed me to the Halifax station and I ordered my ticket to Cape Breton myself.

"My momma don't live here at the Cape," I say.

Old Man McGuire's eyes say he hasn't heard me. He points one of his fingers into my chest. The nail is yellow and curved and wants cutting. A forgotten styrofoam cup, half filled with coffee, distracts the man and his thin spidery legs wander to investigate.

My stomach squelches inside as I miss Momma. She smells like flowers, and her house like dried apples. She tucks heavy blankets tight around me when I sleep, until I'm "snug as a bug in a rug," she says. She's smart too, and has taught me about justice, and the Charter of Rights and John Diefenbaker.

My hand closes around the handful of bills and change in my pocket. I step to the ticket counter and stretch my neck to peek through the rectangular opening in the window. A pin-striped man sits clipping paper clips together in a long chain.

"When is the next train to Halifax, please? I want to go back." My heart pounds chug-a-luglug, chug-a-luglug like wheels in my chest.

The man snorts and twines the chain around his fingers. "This here's the Greyhound bus station, boy. Trains don't run to Halifax anymore. Next bus in thirty minutes,"

I smooth the bills, deliberating and counting the cost.

"Edison."

My back straightens to attention. That's my father's voice. His presence penetrates every corner of the station. Mrs. Maybird adjusts her hair, the ticket man begins to fill orders. The clock ticks louder and my heart sinks, derailed.

Fluffy Carrie, my father's friend, shakes her head and giggles.

"Hello Daddy," I say. I raise my arm to shake his hand, but his eyes move down my feet; I realize with horror that my shoelace is untied. Father gives no verbal reprimand, but disapproval seeps through my skin and into my bones. I let my arm fall again at my side.

McGuire whoops and cackles. "You're pickled, boy! You're a pickle in a jar!"

Father doesn't seem to hear or see the crazed bum, but nods to my things and moves toward the door. Carrie bends down and kisses me on the cheek--she smells like powder and plastic, and I want to pinch her.

Momma says I should be nice to Carrie, even though she smokes, has feathery hats and painted nails, but Momma's never even met her.

Before leaving I look once around the waiting room. Mrs. Maybird is smiling at my father's grey overcoat back, the ticket man sits with his chin in his hand. McGuire raises left leg, right leg alternately, like teats on a milk cow. One of his eyes shines mischievously, and he points to Carrie and giggles like a woman.

Carrie smiles again her frosted smile, and to my surprise, I flip her the bird. Crazy Man McGuire's chortles and clucks ring in my ears as I follow my father's back out the door.

* * *

I lay my suitcase and knapsack at my feet, and stand unmoving in front of my father's leather-backed armchair. He pauses his smoking and looks questioningly at me. "Well, boy. You're looking fine. Welcome back home...and well, yes...put your bags in your room as you please."

And Father is finished speaking. He raises his cigar to mustached lips, closing his eyes as he draws in his cheeks. Looking closer, I notice the lines, like deep ravines, which carve up his face into puffy sections. There are double or triple lines outlining the bulbous parts of his porous nose. Deep creases shape the bridge between his eyes. I lean in to look at the deep cleft, like the slit of a bum, which separates his chin in two. This is Father.

Anxious that his eyes might open with me still there, I slide one hand around the grip of my travel bag, and close the gaping mouth of my knapsack with the other. I see Father watching through slitted eyes as I leave the leather study.

My room isn't at all like I left it; the bed is made with a woman-white quilt cover, and there are grown-up pictures hanging, of goofy boys with red suspenders, playing baseball. And Carrie is in it.

"Come in, honey. I don't bite." Her voice oozes sweetness. She recrosses her patterned legs and pats the space beside her.

The bed sinks in the middle where Carrie and I sit; there is nowhere to look but in the dresser mirror across the way. You can't help but meet people in mirrors, and my uneasy eyes keep finding her painted ones. I do not think this is pleasant at all, but Carrie's lips spread and open into a high-pitched laugh.

"Edison, honey, you are the most serious, odd little boy I've met. Do you ever smile...or talk?"

Not odd! I peer at the boy in the mirror, my eyes, flecked with green and grey. My mousy hair sticks up in places, but only because it's curly. My mouth is small and straight. I'm not certain what she means me to reply.

"Yes, ma'am," I say. "I can talk and smile both." I take a breath of stale bedroom air, "but please, can I go outside instead?"

Carrie places a red-clawed hand on my hair and rumples it with her fingertips, scratching my scalp slightly. "Sure, shortstuff."

She straightens her suede skirt, picks up her snakeskin purse, and leaves me alone in the mirror.

* * *

The powerful ocean wind whips my face, the smell of dulce and brine fills my nostrils and lungs. I lean into the gale, letting my arms hang loose and pull backwards by the force. My shoes go sloop-sluck, sloop-sluck in the gushy mud, and I wonder what would happen if it was chocolate. Chocolate for meals, snacks and for eternity, I think.

But the Breton chocolate trail is becoming grass and moss under my feet, and rocks push up between the foliage. Momma told me once about a mammoth creature named Seymour who dug out the ocean with his bare hands, pilling up the stones on shore; that's where the rocks are from. Momma tells good stories; she would hold me on her night-gowned lap, even though I'm not so little now, and tell all sorts of made-up stories of the sea. There was always a funny ending; Seymour got his name from his whale-of-an-eye that made him see so well, clear across the ocean!

I crawl on my knees and hands now because the smooth rocks are so steep and high that I can't walk up them. The angry ocean blasts in rhythm against the sunlit coast, spraying water all over the rocks like salty spit.

As I reach the top of my rock, I see first a frizzy grey head, with a shiny hole in the middle, then a faded blue jacket. I'm not alone here, there was a man sitting out to sea. My feet step extra quiet because I know who it is; McGuire was here. He is filling the little smooth notch in the stone which is my spot; it perfectly fits me and my sack of sandwiches which Momma always made me. From my space in the notch you can see all of the ocean and all of the sky, but still be fit inside, safe, within the rock shape. The mouths of the waves nip my shoeless toes, but no matter how they leap and twist up, the waves only fizz and spatter.

McGuire's grown-up bum hardly fits into my little nick of stone, but he joyously swings his short pant legs above the ocean lick. His mouth puckers out in a tuneless whistle, like he's singing with the wind. Crazy Man turns his head and smiles an open brown-toothed smile at my approach. I sit on my coverall knees beside him.

"Hello, Crazy Man," I say. An amused laugh comes into his right eye and he rests a gnarled palm on my slight shoulders. "Do you want to know where these rocks come from?" I ask.

He does, so I tell him about Seymour, whose gigantic arms with muscles like Samson's dug for so many years, day and night, to carve the bowl of the sea. McGuire listens attentively throughout my tale, giving only a surprised cluck every now and then, so I also tell him about Carrie, and the lipstick on her teeth, and about Father and his tight bow ties which make him angry, and I tell him about Momma and her little pretty house with no food in it, and how she got so angry and tears came when I told her I wanted, needed to stay.

McGuire listens, his ear cocked to me, and his gaze suspended between the foaming green and the crags of rock. His chicken cackle lessens and his busy eyebrows gather. He reaches out his yellow-nailed finger, and gingerly wipes the slaty spit off my face and eyes. And Crazy Man draws from his tattered coat a present.

At first I do not know what McGuire is giving me. It's a square wooden piece, with four rough notches etched in the top corners. The center of the wood block has a small shaft reaching all the way to the bottom. I take the gift in my hands, and wrap my fingers around the carved top, unsure of what it's meant to be.

McGuire places a rough hand under my armpit and lifts me to my feet. He raises my gift to his mouth, and facing into the mighty wind, the ocean, the expanse of the sky, McGuire blows and blows. The whistle sounds four clashing pitches at once and bellows, over miles of air, the sound of the train.

My friend lowers the train whistle and looks at me with exultant face, listening to the silence that follows. A look of joy is on his face that is not crazy at all, and my breath catches in my lungs as I gaze.

Crazy Man again places the whistle in my small palm, and wrapping his mighty hand around the back of my head, draws me to him with a force that presses the whistle into my gut and makes me cry out. McGuire releases me and is gone, and I am left again alone with the ocean, the whistle and me.

—Karen Brink

Leftovers

Take this mess from my plate.
Give me a feast fit for a queen:
fluffy pillows of mashed potatoes erupting with a lavish warm blanket of gravy, covering sweet baby carrots.
Give me well-scrubbed cauliflower that rests in a steamy bath of bubbling sauce, lying next to tender meat coated with fresh-smelling spices.

Take this mess from my plate:
Give me the lot I deserve, i need.
“Have a nice day,” you say, taking my last ticket and rationing out another mess to another Raggedy Ann like me.

I think of how tonight you will go to your plush suite in the sky, a castle fit for a queen, and pick at a feast with a silver spoon, wrinkling your nose in disgust, throwing it in the trash to be eaten by dogs.

And I--will wrap my rags around me, relishing greasy tatters and licking your bones.

—Julia Dam

Night Class

a neverending game of intellectual dodge-ball under guns and thumbs makes me tired and wired I just don't know what you want and I'm sure not gonna give it to you, and no! I don't find it fascinating
so don't look at me for answers.
I'm not a stute
and you're not con cise
I'm just a backwoods rube who wants to throw a bric for two hours
and a half.

—Andrea VanderKooij

Tired of...

I have two fingers,
one in each ear;
with my teeth I grab a glass of whisky, tip my head back and swallow;
elbows raised,
fingers still in place;
my arms are chicken wings.
You're talking,
I know,
but I can't hear you and soon I'll be asleep.

—Kai Groen

Danse Macabre

Black trees like charred skeletons dance-- burnt marionettes in a sinister wind that whistles with haunting timbre an ominous tune.
 In the twilight of black November they wave grotesquely, swaying trance-like, silhouettes against a foreboding sky smeared with charcoal clouds.
The candle in my window flickers; I watch, again alone. Not a simple whisper in my ear; it is the limbs that rattle, clacking;
 bony digits reach: hungry sticks of skinny beggars.
Death sticks to blades of grass like clinging grasshoppers, seeps under windows and oozes along walls; thief-like clouds creep and slither to smother the unsuspecting moon.

—Stephanie Cilia

Elegy

They live in oak coffins with fake gold trim:
places, people circumstances.
Never a day passes that they don't knock on my door, but I am no necromancer;
I can't bring them back from death, from memory
 to physicality.
I can see them waving from the shore as I sail, looking back, on a ship of thoughtful fools.

—Kai Groen

Two People in a Place

Mindi enters the ballroom at Mitch's side. Actually, she walks a step behind him. She wears a long and shapeless black dress with long sleeves. Mitch wears his tailored tuxedo that so immaculately accentuates his broad shoulders and his curved, carved buttocks. His bow-tie is crisp.

"These lights are so bright," says Mindi.

"But don't they make you feel so alive!" breathes Mitch.

As they move further into the glittering room, Mitch quickens his pace, craning his neck and darting his head in every direction to find all the people he knows. A beautiful bird. Mindi lags behind and focuses her stare directly ahead on Mitch's back. She swallows frequently.

"Oh Min," says Mitch as he flies further away, "I just saw Douglas and Baylor and, well, a whole slew of other fellows that I need to touch base with. Do you mind?"

He says more, but his head is turned away from Mindi towards the sparkling people and his words fade as he breezes into the waves of crowd. Mindi retreats and promptly bumps into a shiny lady.

"Oh, I'm terribly sorry," says Mindi. "I'm awfully clumsy. Are you all right? I'm terribly sorry."

The lady nods once in haughty annoyance and turns her back. Mindi steps forward but then steps backward and then turns around, unsure of where she should go. She spots a table bearing an enormous punch bowl, and she steps carefully towards it, focusing her gaze directly ahead on the crystal bowl. She is very conscious of the sound of her own footsteps. At the table, she picks up a glass of glistening punch. Her hand trembles as she raises the glass to her unpainted lips.

An outburst of laughter seizes her attention away from the punch bowl. She turns and notices a group of happy people who appear to dominate the activity of the ballroom. The attention of the group is converged on Mitch.

"And so Leno said, 'Where did you learn to make your line of questioning so unanswerable?' And then I said, 'The truth is, Jay, I took lessons from both Benjamin Matlock and Perry Mason.'"

Uproarious laughter. Mindi looks on from behind her punch glass.

"The trick with Jay Leno is, you give him sugar. That's what he wants, even if he knows you're deeper than the icing."

Fierce nods of acknowledgement. Mitch grins and the lights reflect on his teeth. He turns his head to discreetly itch his neck and in doing so, catches a glimpse of Mindi standing by the punch bowl. Craning his neck and raising his arm above the crowd, he beckons obviously to her. A beautiful bird in the shine-reflecting water, in control. His attention then steers immediately back to the happy group, and the convergence of glittering attentions is on him again. Mindi weaves awkwardly through the sequins and sparkles to follow Mitch's summons. At last she finds his back.

"This is my wife," says Mitch, pulling her towards his side. "Min, this is everyone."

Mindi stares directly ahead at the sleeve of Mitch's tuxedo, which is still before her. Mitch still shines upon the faces of the group and his mouth opens to say something more.

"What do you do? Min was it?" asks a female voice from the crowd. Mitch closes his mouth abruptly. Mindi averts her head as though waking from a deep sleep and dream. The voice is speaking to her.

"What do I do? Do you mean for a living?"

"Well, anything actually," the voice laughs.

Mindi stares into nowhere and a long, dead silence falls over the crowd. The bright lights make her look wan. She swallows. And swallows again. "I don't really know. I don't do anything, especially. Nothing in particular. Nothing of importance."

—Jane Hogeterp

INVISIBLE

Sometimes, as I sit alone,
I wonder...
Am I here at all?
I laugh,
no one smiles.
I cry,
no one weeps.
All around me,
people gather happily,
life is great,
but not for me.
I sit alone,
wishing...
perhaps foolishly,
for someone to care,
to fall in love with ME.
I bear no hatred,
I love those who are lucky.
I just wish...
I wish they loved me too.
The Bible and its teachers, they all reply,
Jesus is enough, I need no other friend.
It may be true,
but not for me.
I need someone here, someone on earth.
Someone strong and wise.
I need to touch,
that friend... before my eyes.

—Kathleen Jarvis

Salt Water Wells, Stale Loaves

I go to the well
And look to the bottom
I see all the pebbles
I see the grasses
And decaying leaves
The water is foul
Full of tobacco
Full of salt

I go to the well
And look to the bottom
I see all the clothes
The bras
The panties
The water is beautiful Full of sex
Full of salt

I go to the well
And look to the bottom
I see the sheets of music
And the notes of anger
I hear the water
Moving swiftly
Full of hate
Full of salt

I go to the well
And look to the bottom
But I don't find it Water so deep Water so cold Water pure
And good
Full of life Full

But I walk
From the well
Drinking from the salt
From well to well
I go
Eating stale loaves
To keep me going In circles

—Neil Houtman

When I Was a Lamb

“Did you know sheep have tails?” I kick my rubber boots against feedbin below, shake my head “no”; I follow the Bunyan hand as it reaches for redhot vice.

His oily fist clenches four hoofed legs.
Upended between coverall thighs the lamb is still; glassy eyes blink, bemused.
Searing clamp closes around matted wool.

Acrid smoke of burning flesh enters my nostrils and chokes.
Like fetid, wet firelogs, a sizzle, a dull thud, through serried bone.

Then the shortened lamb is righted and with wriggly behind skitters to friends.
Mr. Coe glances up; I gulp at his words, “Who cut off your tail, boy?”

—Karen Brink

Brotherly Love

My vision has turned red Blood red it seems I attempt to dry my face but my kleenex dissolves in all the blood
I am not bleeding for I feel no pain at all some joy maybe I don't know why I'm smiling just am Usually a lifeless body in front of me would be horror especially ones whose wrists have been slit still pumping I notice I shrug put down the knife wash my hands and go upstairs

—Caleb deboer

Lost in the Valley

I thought only guys were afraid to look at maps.

I haven't taken mine out in a really long time now, and I'm thoroughly lost, I'm sure.

But I'm also sure that when I give in and give up and unfold the map again-- it will tell me exactly how to get home.

—Jeannette Sandink

Buried Thoughts

An image stirs up memories, Fragments of the past Rise to the surface
A puzzle of pieces
That don't quite fit.
Reality blurs,
Details fade.
Thoughts teeter on the edge
A tiny shove,
A slight distraction,
And it's lost.
Slipping through the fingers of the mind, Falling into the pit of subconscious.

—Caroline Kralt

Sins of Omission

A gold mine, undiscovered by the one to whom it belongs.

The riches unused, wealth under cover under rock hard as flesh;

A crime equal to theft.

(yet it is simple to hide sins of omission)

—Jeannette Sandink

Satellite on the Schoolyard

Playground, soccer field, set of swings and jungle gym -- see in them the swarming, spinning orbitings (the atonal music of the spheres) of children spread across their course.

Uncharted corner of the space, a sodden patch of grass where fences meet, chainlink clawing weeds and dirt -- see in that the drifting motion of a boy.

He is who I was, light years ago, a world a sun away.
When a larger body, brawling in sun-baked, dirt-caked jeans and musclebound shirt would near my atmosphere, I would rise with a tremor in my core, pulled closer by reputation's gravity.

Our eyes would meet like poles opposed -- north and south -- and, pull and push, I fled repulsed through hollow holes of dark where no voice called, no light enthralled, no movement passed my desert path.

I once approached the glowing blaze of a stardust girl, only to be met by her nebulous laughter, a supernova of contempt, leaving me to fly again, among the glaring clustered bodies, my blushing fiery face burned and scorned, my body withered in its soot, streaking like a comet with its tail between its legs.

He is who I am and he is not. A glow exudes, his atmosphere is warm and breatheable. A dimpled crescent beams in the contours of his globe. He brushes the dirt from his knees and mounts the swing again.

I recall rough weather. Typhoon, cyclone, the seasons of my skies were all monsoon and water doused the glowing. Toxins bobbed about my air, creatures suffered there, and bitter winters blighted flora's growth.

I watch his revolutions, his rings of smiling round and round the trees, round the battered athletes' scuffed up knees, a light beneath his bruises. I recall lying there, lowering my head into the coming laughter, and wonder.

Which secret mines yield such ore of gleaming underneath? Does the core bubble, does some star stare at him with love, or is this all a trick of light and shade?

He is who I was, but he will never follow my vacant trails across this sky.
When I observe a huddled gang of children, hear their bright tones of joy, squeals, shrieks, their crashing accusations -- when I walk the streets at lunchtime, downtown, look in storefronts, or talk to haggling bums at busstops -- when I phone a friend, share a taxi with a stranger, when I see a crowd --

I merely see a galaxy of single orbits unrelated, tracing paths across the sky, across the street, across the city toward inconclusive ends, in circles around the same dying sun.

We are all one another's Plutos, tiny chunks of rock and ice so cold and far away that to him my sun appears no brighter, no warmer, than a match just past arm's length, unreachable.

On the schoolyard our hellos are pindrops on a planet's surface a billion miles away, our study groups are stars colliding, parties are the mass inhaled into a gaping black hole.

At a desk alone, a book before me, enveloped in an atmosphere of heat and light which calmly shields me from the nebulae and solar winds beyond the clouds, I'm a healthy planet.

Thus I watch this image of myself, my twin world, the world I once was, bounding on the playground. Separated by a universe of matter, each unreachable to the other, we are close as any two.

—David Lehr

Song

Blackness falls, tension builds, hush sweeps across the room.
All is silent,
focussed, anticipating.
Light streams on a lone figure, her eyes closed, body swaying, while soft melodies whisper and encircle wholly.
Lips part, breath swells and the soul overwhelms and bursts... into song.

—Julia Dam

Outsider

Montage of withered bent skeleton frames draped in striped dirty faded cloths which seem to hold up the starved bodies.
Grime clogs up every last suffocating pore, parched lips pursed tight, laughterless.
The man in back glances outside sight, smugly bears his clean shaven creamy pus.
Under his rags this man is an outcast.
White shirt and pristine Oxford tie.
He is so unfamiliar the others can't see him.
Sunken dark sockets surround dry eyes that look through their world of hate.
They stand like cattle waiting for slaughter, waiting to be ordered or beaten senseless.

—Caleb deBoer

Sour Grapes

When I spoke to Annie last my head went numb-- that is what happens, (I think) when years of faith melt like wax without wicks, a stench heavy, thick like incense, nothing left but ashes at my feet and on my forehead, gritty on my shaking fingers.
Take of this body, drink Christ with a cork, she said;
How can you believe it's Him When all you taste is sour grapes?

—Stephanie Cilia

